While working on this book I have incurred a long list of debts. Generous research grants from the Wellcome Trust, the Leverhulme Trust and Birkbeck College made it possible for me to undertake such a big project in the first place.

The research began at Imperial College, where I benefitted from advice from Andrew Warwick, David Edgerton, Andrew Mendelsohn and Rob Iliffe. Charmian Brinson kindly gave me access to her archive on Eva Kolmer and other useful sources. Charles Drage spent long hours helping me to translate barely legible Russian typescript. Janis Lewis at Imperial College Library patiently arranged my frequent interlibrary loan demands for obscure East German pamphlets. Also at Imperial I was lucky enough to be surrounded by a cohort of fellow researchers, who during lively lunches, seminars and drinks helped to keep up morale and ponder the finer points of scholarship and life: thanks go particularly to Sabine Clark, Matt Godwin, John Heard, Becky Higgitt, Louise Jarvis, Jenny Marie, Emily Mayhew, Raquel Delgado-Moreira and Nafsika Thalassis.

I am also grateful for many fruitful discussions and eye-opening conversations with colleagues at Birkbeck, particularly John Arnold, Joanna Bourke, David Feldman, Mark Mazower, Daniel Pick, Lucy Riall, Jan Rueger and Nik Wachsmann. Frank Trentmann provided invaluable encouragement at various crucial stages and heroically offered advice on a complete draft of the manuscript. Claire Judde de Larivière gave up many hours and days to discuss and translate my French sources. I am also grateful to Mary Fulbrook and Paul Weindling for their ongoing interest in and support of the project. Other colleagues whose wisdom I have appreciated on countless occasions include Matthew Frank, Peter Gatrell, Ben Shephard and Dieter Steinert. Thanks also to Jen Baird, Serafina Cuomo, Sean Brady and Christian Goeschel for their friendship and academic good sense.

During the course of the research I have benefitted from the knowledge and assistance of many archivists and librarians. In London, the British Library, the Public Record Office, the German Historical Institute in Bloomsbury, the Imperial War Museum and the Wellcome Library have all proved to be excellent resources, as has the Bodleian Library in Oxford, and my thanks go to the staff at these institutions. Richard Temple at the Modern Records Centre at the University of Warwick was very helpful on a number of occasions. Many thanks to Frau Hübel and Dr Achim Baumgarten at the Bundesarchiv Koblenz, and Frau Fengler and Frau Löffler at the Bundesarchiv Berlin, for helping to make my many research trips so productive. At the Landesarchiv Berlin Dr Susanne Knoblich and Dr Luchterhand have been immensely helpful in locating relevant material. Dr Wolfgang Knoblich at the archive of the Berliner Akademie also has been very accommodating. I am grateful to Moritz Mebel in Berlin, who kindly agreed to be interviewed by me. Also in Berlin, Ruth Notowicz and Lutz Masernetz provided me with a friendly retreat after long days in the archives. In Washington, Sally Kuisel shared her impressive knowledge of the vast amounts of sources at the National Archives and Records Administration. My thanks also go to Marie Villemin at the World Health Organisation Archive in Geneva for her enthusiastic assistance. Finally, I had a wonderful time in the Archives of the Occupation of Germany and Austria in Colmar, not least because I was able to work unsupervised.

At OUP, my thanks go above all to Christopher Wheeler for his encouragement and support. Stephanie Ireland, Cathryn Steele and Carol Carnegie ensured a wonderfully smooth and efficient production process. Rowena Anketell and Mary Payne's careful reading of the manuscript helped me to avoid some howlers.

This has also been a family project, as Marion Kant and Jonathan Steinberg can testify. They have repeatedly dropped their own work to read, comment, translate, criticise, suggest, nag or encourage. Finally, Rhodri Jones has suffered through the whole venture from beginning to end, read and improved multiple drafts and spent much time building me up, and to him I owe the greatest debt.
