FOREWORD

A reference book of this kind is rarely the product of one person's labor. Work on the Research Guide began in 1974. Since that time, many people have been involved in the various stages of research. James Reardon-Anderson organized the initial team. Under his supervision, Sybil Aldridge, Tom Gottschang, Tony Kane, Ted Levine, and Tony Shaheen spent long hours looking through the volumes of Survey of the China Mainland Press for translated editorials. Dorothy Perng carefully created each editorial reference card. James Tong translated titles into English when they did not appear in the translation series. Mark Wolf did much of the actual subject indexing. Chan Wah-kong and Dan Benski laboriously checked columns of numbers during the final stage of manuscript preparation. Tim Christensen gallantly typed the entire manuscript with great patience, humor, and skill. India Bateman and Marla Camp provided administrative assistance. The project was funded by the Bureau of Intelligence and Research of the Department of State. We are thankful to the Department of State for its sponsorship, and we alone bear all responsibility for shortcomings in the project.

PREFACE

Michel Oksenberg and Gail Henderson

In recent years, scholars have compiled a number of valuable English-language research aids to facilitate use of primary sources on contemporary China. Principal among these are Kenneth Lieberthal's Research Guide to Central Meetings in China, John Starr's Post-Liberation Works of Mao Zedong, John Emerson, et al., The Provinces of the People's Republic of China: A Political and Economic Bibliography, and T. T. Hsia's Guide to Selected Legal Sources of Mainland China.¹ These works provide quick access to the key, high-level decision meetings in China since 1949, all known post-1949 statements of Mao Zedong, available provincial budgets, economic development plans, political assessments, and major normative enactments.

The present guide to People's Daily editorials from 1949 to 1975 now joins this list. Its purpose is to provide researchers with an easy-to-use aid to this crucial series of policy statements. Arranged chronologically and with an extensive subject index, the Research Guide provides access to the only continuous source from China which illuminates high-level policy.

This preface provides information on how to use the Research Guide. At the outset, however, it seems wise to address four issues: the importance of People's Daily editorials in the Chinese system; the way People's Daily editorials are written; the research significance of the continuity of the editorials; and some suggestions as to specific research topics for which the Research Guide will prove particularly useful.

Significance of People's Daily Editorials

The People's Daily (Renmin ribao) is the daily organ of the Central Committee of the Chinese Communist Party. As such, it is the equivalent of Pravda in the Soviet Union, that is, the daily publication in the country which speaks for the government and the party. Franklin Houn correctly notes that unlike the Soviet government with its daily, Izvestia, the Chinese government apparatus does not publish its own daily paper, and thus the People's Daily in China plays a role analogous to both Pravda and Izvestia in the U.S.S.R.² The newspaper is China's national daily, printed on the same day in printing plants throughout China. Its circulation is enormous, totalling as of 1980 nearly eight million daily copies. Moreover, each copy has a high readership, circulating within the many production or residential units which receive copies and being displayed prominently on busy street corners and in entryways.

The general public is well aware that the People's Daily reflects the latest thinking of the top leadership. For much of Mao's era in particular, not only officials, but the attentive public avidly studied the People's Daily to acquire a sense of impending policy shifts that would require changes in personal conduct and utterances. And within this already authoritative publication, the editorial assumed special importance. In degree of authoritativeness, it ranks just below directives, Party resolutions, and, especially from 1965 to 1976, the statements of Chairman Mao himself.

These editorials often accompany directives to help explain their importance or are the overt manifestations of a secret Party directive. In either case, supplementary information is frequently disseminated through secret Party channels about the topic of the editorial. Moreover, the editorial often becomes the subject of discussion within the small units into which adult Chinese, especially in urban areas, are grouped.³ People's Daily editorials are also often reprinted in other Beijing and provincial newspapers, and specialized editorials are reproduced in the relevant ministerial journals. Editorials are also disseminated through the Xinhua she (New China News Agency) wire service. They are frequently read over the radio, usually in abridged form but sometimes in their entirety. Particularly important ones are reprinted in such series as the annual Renmin shouce [People's handbook, 1949-1965], the monthly and semimonthly Xinhua yuebao [New China monthly] or Xinhua banyuekan [New China fortnightly], and the Renmin ribao shelun xuanji [Compilation of People's Daily editorials]. Finally, Chinese bibliographers have considered the editorials sufficiently important to have published a chronological listing of them to 1959.⁴

The conclusion is unmistakable: the editorials are a major means, at times the major means, by which the top leadership can communicate its policies directly to the population. Any effort to trace the evolution of a particular policy in China or to analyze a particular time span requires extensive familiarity with the pertinent People's Daily editorials.

*The Writing of Editorials*⁵

The People's Daily staff includes a section (ke) in charge of editorials. Given the significance of editorials, however, it should not be surprising that the editorials writers, in spite of their ideological or political astuteness, do not have the final word on topic selection or text approval. To be sure, some editorials originate within the section itself. The editorial writers have access to inner-Party directives and are aware of Politburo, Secretariat, and work-conference deliberations, and their experience frequently dictates what topics are worthy of editorial treatment. But inspiration for editorials can come from outside the editorial section as well. One important source is the editor-in-chief of the newspaper. Those who have held this post have never been members of either the Politburo or the Secretariat, but they have generally had significant access to the highest-level policy deliberations. Both the editor-in-chief and the head of the New China News Agency have been known to attend Politburo meetings and have been made well aware of the concerns of the top leaders. A second source of editorials is the top leadership itself. Mao Zedong, Liu Shaoqi, and Zhang Chunqiao, for example, are all known to have recommended and supervised the drafting of specific editorials at different times. A third source is inner-Party reports to the top leadership which the leaders recommend be turned into editorials. For example, Mao Zedong once thought particularly well of a summary by the Minister of Education concerning the proceedings of a national education conference and instructed that the report be prepared as a People's Daily editorial.

After an editorial has been drafted, it sometimes circulates among Politburo members for commentary before publication. A number of editorials are known to have been submitted to Mao, Zhou Enlai, Yao Wenyuan, and others for commentary and guidance. It seems that only editorials dealing with particularly sensitive issues require approval by the top levels, but it remains unclear who decides whether an editorial requires top clearance.

The Continuity of People's Daily Editorials

Another consideration enhances the research value of People's Daily editorials. The editorials are the only indicators of top-level policy available to the outside world continuously and in their entirety since the founding of the People's Republic. Because of severe disruptions in Chinese publishing during the Cultural Revolution, only two other national-level newspapers have appeared continuously since 1949:

Bright Daily (Guangming ribao [GMRB]) and Liberation Army Daily (Jiefang junbao [JFJB]). But GMRB is a voice of intellectuals and frequently floats trial balloons; it does not always authoritatively voice policy. Similarly, the voice of the People's Liberation Army (PLA) speaks for only a segment of the state structure, albeit a crucial one, and in any case, most issues of JFJB are not available in the West. To be sure, the theoretical journal Red Flag (Hongqi) is an equally authoritative publication of the CCP Central Committee and all of the issues published are available in the West. But Red Flag only began publication in 1958 and had no precisely equivalent predecessor. Further, it ceased publication for several months during the Cultural Revolution. Other important journals and newspapers, such as the journal of the Communist Youth League, Chinese Youth (Zhongguo qingnian), the newspaper of the trade unions, Worker's Daily (Gongren ribao), and the journal of the women's federation, Chinese Women (Zhongguo funu), also ceased publication during the tumultuous 1966-76 decade.

Moreover, researchers lack direct total access to the major documentary series. The valuable Compendium of Laws and Regulations of the People's Republic of China covers only the period 1949 to 1963, and availability of major directives is a hit-and-miss affair after that date.⁶ Holdings of the crucial Central Committee directive series (zhong-fa) are incomplete.⁷ And the regime has been inconsistent in its reportage of the proceedings of National People's Congresses, National Party Congresses, Central Committee plenums, etc. Sometimes only a brief communiqué was released, while at other times the regime provided rather extensive coverage of major speeches and agenda items. The classified publications which circulate among high-level cadres, that is, the "internal documents" (neibu wenjian), such as Reference News (Cankao xiaoxi), are unavailable in the West. And statistical series exhibit discontinuities as well.⁸

So, we are left with the People's Daily as the only available continuous source on Chinese affairs. Any rigorous effort to chart trends requires constancy in primary sources, or else the researcher is uncertain whether apparent changes are the result of real change or of alteration in sources. In short, the People's Daily and its editorials provide a bedrock for analysis of Chinese politics.

As a result of having the entire universe of editorials, it becomes possible to measure change somewhat more rigorously and to draw a systematic sample of the whole. This is a rare opportunity in the China field: researchers on Chinese affairs are usually forced to draw "samples" from a clearly unrepresentative portion of the whole. Emigrés to Hong Kong who are interviewed on diverse topics are not "representative" of a whole; and, what is worse, since the profile of the whole remains largely unknown, the ways in which the Hong Kong pool of informants are unrepresentative can only be inferred.⁹ The localities visited by foreigners in China are perforce distinctive. But without knowledge of the universe, and hence of what is "typical" or "average," we cannot precisely identify their unique characteristics.

Similar methodological problems, arising from paucity of information, confront analysts of the Chinese elite. Other than for members of the Central Committee of the CCP and a very few other organizational positions, the Chinese have not provided lists of all office-holders of particular positions, such as provincial Party secretaries and commanders and deputy commanders of PLA garrison and regional forces. The primary sources from which Western observers must laboriously assemble their data--largely from monitored radio broadcasts which sometimes refer to an individual holding a particular post--mean that researchers can never be sure they have identified the total universe. While they can attempt to compile biographical information about individual office-holders, such as age, education, or revolutionary background, there is no information available that covers a statistically significant proportion of the group. Thus, as Donald Klein has pointed out in his learned discussion of the subject, we tend to have more information about older, better-educated, KMT-associated Communists, thereby introducing biases into the aggregate data.¹⁰

We have gone into some detail on these points simply to demonstrate the uniqueness of the People's Daily editorial series, which lies in its continuity and its totality. Yet, in more subtle ways, even this series exhibits discontinuities.

The newspaper staff underwent major personnel changes, including replacement of the editor-in-chief, on several occasions, principally after the Hundred Flowers Campaign in 1957, at the start of the Cultural Revolution in 1966, during the curbing of the Cultural Revolution in 1968-69, upon the rehabilitation of many previously disgraced leaders in the journalism field in 1973-75, and then during the struggle over Mao's succession in 1976-78. These personnel changes at the newspaper, though related to shifts in policies and power alignments at the Politburo level, may have had their own dynamics and produced editorial changes that accentuated the political shifts. Hence, changes in the tone of editorials may reflect personnel changes at the paper as well as broader political trends.

The role of RMRB within the system has also changed over time. At times, as in the mid-fifties, the paper had no peer, while during the Cultural Revolution it was somewhat subordinate to and published key editorials in conjunction with Red Flag and Liberation Army Daily. In 1975-76 it appears to have been one of the power bases of the "radicals" in their struggle against Deng Xiaoping and his supporters, with the result that the paper did not fully expound Deng's policies of 1975 and did not accurately reflect the range of high-level thinking about the 1976 Tienanmen incident. Moreover, the frequency of editorials varied enormously over time. As a result of all these considerations, People's Daily editorials may mirror Central Committee policy somewhat imperfectly, with the degree of integration between Party policy and editorial policy possibly varying over time. These are important cautionary notes to bear in mind as the researcher seeks to use the editorials for rigorous analytical purposes.

Applications of the Research Guide

The Research Guide lends itself to a number of applications, some of which deserve mention here. Allowing for the hubris of the bibliographers, we believe that the Guide will encourage a degree of rigor in the study of Chinese politics and facilitate the testing of certain hypotheses which previously were not easily subject to scrutiny. Our claim requires some elaboration.

Following the Calendar. Chinese political life exhibits an annual rhythm, based on the agricultural, educational, and industrial calendars, annual holidays, and commemorations. The agricultural cycle, for instance, begins with the spring chores of plowing and planting, continuing through the summer tasks of harvesting and planting. Then come the fall activities of harvesting, collecting taxes, and storing grain, and the annual rhythm ends in winter with work on irrigation facilities, soil improvement, and repair of tools. The annual school calendar moves from summer examinations to enrollment, graduation, and placement of graduates. The industrial cycle revolves around preparation and implementation of the annual and quarterly plans and budgets. China's annual holidays are New Year's Day, the Spring Festival, May Day, Army Day (August 1), and National Day (October 1). Other annual occasions of national commemoration include International Women's Day, International Children's Day, the anniversary of China's entry into the Korean War, Soviet National Day, Sun Yatsen's birthday and the anniversary of his death, the anniversary of the 1911 revolution overthrowing the Qing dynasty, the anniversary of the May 4th and December 9th movements, the anniversary of Mao Zedong's speech on literature and art at the Yan'an forum, the anniversary of the suppression of intellectuals on Taiwan, and so on. People's Daily editorials frequently, but not always, mark these annual occasions. Built into the Chinese policy process, therefore, is the need to decide whether or not the annual event merits an editorial and, if so, what to say.

Curiously, students of Chinese politics have yet to analyze the annual rhythm of the Chinese political process in depth. This research guide facilitates such a study. In what years, in which contexts, and in what ways were each of these annual events deemed significant and noted in RMRB editorials? At a minimum, whenever an editorial related to the annual cycle appears, it must be compared to the previous annual editorials on the same subject before its true policy tenor can be discerned. For example, editorials on spring planting have tended to exhibit particular concern for peasant morale and signalled a reining in of whatever efforts had been underway during the winter to foster social or cultural change in the countryside. It was to be expected, in other words, that the month of April in the Chinese countryside during Mao's era was more "conservative" in terms of social or cultural policy than the preceding February. To assess accurately trends in rural policies, then, the analyst has to compare a period not so much with the immediately previous and subsequent months as with the same months of earlier years. The question the analyst should ask is, "Is this year's spring planting editorial similar to the ones in years of social change--1955, 1958, 1969--or is it similar to the years of calm--1954, 1956, 1963, 1972?" This guide facilitates such comparisons by providing ready bibliographic access to each annual editorial associated with an annual event.

Evolving Politburo Agenda. In the absence of direct access to Politburo proceedings, one of the best guides to the agenda of issues confronting the Politburo is the RMRB editorial. The chronological listing of the editorials records, month by month, many of the substantive problems with which the leaders were grappling. (Personal appointments and the structure of power are important exceptions; those major, highly divisive issues are not the subjects of editorials.¹¹) The Research Guide facilitates a more rigorous treatment of the changing agenda. One hypothesizes, for example, that economic issues received great emphasis through the fifties, but as the Cultural Revolution approached, ideological concerns became paramount, only to fade somewhat in the 1971-74 era. A quantitative analysis of the frequency with which editorials have dwelt on various subjects would be one way to test the hypothesis, on the assumption that the editorials are an indicator of the shifting priorities of the leaders.

Another hypothesis is that, at any specific time, one or two regions of the country provide inspiration to Chinese leaders in their search for models worthy of national emulation that have successfully implemented their preferred policies: e.g., the Northeast in the early 1950s; Anhui and Shandong during the Great Leap; Shanghai during the Cultural Revolution. Reference to provinces, noted in the subject index, would help test this hypothesis.

Interrelationship of Issues. The Guide will not only help chart the relative importance of issues and localities over time; it also facilitates discovery of covariation of subjects. For example, it facilitates the testing of three notions about Chinese foreign policy. (1) Management of Chinese policy toward the United States was largely in the hands of Zhou Enlai, while Soviet policy fell more to Mao Zedong. The corollary would be that references to Zhou Enlai are more frequent in foreign policy editorials dealing with the United States, in contrast to editorials on the Soviet Union, which make more frequent references to Mao. (2) The Chinese perceive a conflict between pursuing constructive relations with the developed world and with the developing world. A corollary, based on study of RMRB editorials, would be that the number of favorable editorial references to Western Europe, Japan, and the United States on the one hand and to Third World countries on the other are inversely related. (3) Chinese crisis behavior exhibits recurring patterns of signalling to the adversary,¹² and the Chinese use external crises to mobilize the population for domestic purposes.¹³ The editorials could be systematically studied through several crises to search both for the recurring themes (in contrast to noncrisis foreign policy editorial) and for correlations with domestic themes.

The Guide will also facilitate testing a portion of the interesting Skinner-Winckler theory concerning a "compliance cycle" in Mao's China.¹⁴ Limited to the peasant sector, but applicable to other sectors as well, Skinner and Winckler have argued that the leaders followed a cycle in their application of power, primarily relying in succession upon remunerative power (material reward), normative power (ideology), coercive power (force and threat of force), remunerative power, and so on. The editorials cannot demonstrate a crucial aspect of the Skinner-Winckler theory, namely, that the nature of compliance with each type of power forces the leaders to adopt the successive type of power in the sequence. But one empirically verifiable assertion of Skinner and Winckler has never really been tested. Certain of the headings in the topical index deal with the utility of various policies (such as those concerning rural markets, wages, socialist education, and public security) in eliciting popular compliance with regime objectives. These policies are, of course, translatable into the Skinner-Winckler power typology: free markets involve remunerative power, socialist education involves normative power, and so on. One would only need to code these editorials according to whether they encourage or discourage the application of a particular type of power and then measure the variations in RMRB encouragement of the use of the three types of power to see whether the Skinner-Winckler assertion holds true. Whether the analysis verifies, modifies, or casts doubt on Skinner-Winckler, it would nonetheless permit a more refined understanding than we now have of fluctuations and trends in the regime's application of various types of power.

Relationship between Public and Internal Processes. We have thus far implied that RMRB editorials accurately represent the full array of leadership concerns and policies. This is not actually the case, however. At best, RMRB editorials form an imperfect mirror of the regime's use of power. They certainly do not expose with sufficient clarity, for example, the coercive dimension of Mao's system. Nor do they clearly reveal major upheavals among the leadership until sometime after the fact. RMRB editorials of the period referred only elliptically to the removal from office of Gao Gang in December 1953, the purge of Peng Dehuai in August 1959, and the fall of Lin Biao in September 1971. Only years later did RMRB editorials deal openly with these incidents. Similarly, RMRB editorials only hinted at the intensity of the Sino-Soviet dispute from 1959 to 1963 and referred in veiled form to the process of Sino-American rapprochement from 1969 to 1971. As a result, an accurate reading of RMRB editorials requires the ability to decode esoteric communications.¹⁵

With the completion of the Research Guide, we now have the opportunity to make major progress in honing our ability to "read between the lines." Using this guide in combination with Lieberthal's guides to central Party meetings and central documents and Starr's guide to known public and private statements of Mao will enable us to trace the relationship between public statements and inner-government processes and to assess the extent to which RMRB editorials mirror internal deliberations. To what extent are the issues known to have been discussed at secret CCP Central Work Conferences revealed in RMRB editorials? To the extent that they were reported, did the editorials illuminate these issues before, during, or after the conference in question? If before, did the editorials usually enunciate the policy which the conference subsequently adopted? An affirmative finding would suggest that the conferences merely ratified predetermined policies, which would cast doubt on the role Western analysts think they play. Did editorials in anticipation of a conference advocate policies that were being supported by a portion of the Politburo? If so, this would suggest that RMRB editorials can play an advocacy role. If the editorials illuminated the work conference agenda after its adjournment, did they always faithfully report what we now know were conference decisions? How long did it usually take before RMRB editorialized conference proceedings? Are there differences over time and among issues? The opportunity for rigorous, path-breaking research here is considerable. In fact, the Department of State sponsored this guide precisely on the grounds that it would facilitate research on the relationship between private, inner-Party processes and more open, public processes.

The Research Guide: An Introduction

The Research Guide to People's Daily Editorials is a chronological list of all editorials which appeared in the People's Daily from 1949 to 1975, with reference to translations in the Survey of the China Mainland Press when they appear and with a 571-item subject index of all the editorials, whether they appeared in the translation series or not. The subject index is based roughly on the original SCMP index, and because it refers researchers to the SCMP translations, the Research Guide uses the old Peking Review system of romanization which SCMP employed at that time (similar to the Wade-Giles system but omitting the apostrophe).

The Research Guide does not include other types of editorial commentaries often found in the People's Daily. We initially attempted to include pinglun ("commentaries") and *guan*cha ("observations") as well as the editorials. However, time constraints and the fact that the editorials alone numbered over five thousand dictated the decision to select only the most important format of editorial expression. That was clearly the editorial. We also limited ourselves to using only one translation series. This was an easier decision since the vast majority of editorial translations are located in the SCMP series. Moreover, the two other major translation series--the Joint Publication Research Service and the Foreign Broadcast Information Service--are less readily available in libraries for the 1949-79 era.

Organization of the Research Guide

The Research Guide is divided into two sections. The first section includes the list of editorial titles and the reference to translations in the SCMP series. The format is as follows:

Date Editorial Appears in the People's Daily	Editorial Title	Page Nos. in the People's Daily	SCMP * Issue No. and Page Nos. (when the editorial was translated)
---	-----------------	---	--

For translated editorials, the title has been given exactly as it appeared in SCMP. This has perpetuated some awkward, and even inaccurate, translations, but it seemed more important to help the reader locate the text. Where there were no translations, we have provided our own. Many of the editorials also had subtitles; those which contained useful additional information have been summarized and placed in parentheses after the title.

The list of editorial titles provides a complete chronological overview of editorials. This is particularly valuable for the reader who cannot use Chinese-language sources and is forced to rely upon translations. Certainly, the percentage of editorials selected for translation varied remarkably from year to year, as table 1 illustrates.

The second section of the Research Guide is the subject index. Each subject heading is followed by a column of dates. These are the editorial publication dates and correspond to the dates by which the editorial titles are listed in the first section.

The subjects used to index the editorials fall under thirteen general categories: (1) Government, (2) Chinese Communist Party, (3) Democratic Parties, (4) Mass Organizations, (5) Campaigns (listed chronologically), (6) National Leaders, (7) Economy, (8) Education, Culture, and Health, (9) Demographic, Class, and Occupational Groups, (10) Regions of China, (11) Military, (12) International Relations, and (13) Countries of the World.

The index is organized in outline form, and that outline has been reproduced as a table of contents which precedes the index itself. This will serve both to acquaint the reader with the wide range of topics and to provide a more thorough definition of the abbreviated headings which are found in the index. Many of the topics in the index will be found relevant to a particular research project, and the reader should review the entire list of topics at the outset. For example, if one is tracing the evolution of agricultural policy in China, one would not only consult editorials indexed under "Agricultural Production," but also those listed for "Campaigns" with a rural focus and such "Economy" topics as "Rural Finance."

Each editorial has been indexed exhaustively. That is, each editorial was indexed for both its major and minor themes. An editorial generally contained about five or six themes. However, some touched on as many as fifteen, while others covered only one or two. To cope with this large number, the themes were divided into two types: if more than one paragraph in an editorial was devoted to a subject, it was classified as a major theme; if a subject was contained in one paragraph or less, it was a minor theme. Briefly mentioned items were not indexed. The number of major themes in each editorial averaged two or three; depending on the length and depth of the editorial, however, it might range from one to five. In the index, an asterisk (*) after an editorial date indicates that the subject was a major theme in the editorial.

*In 1974, Survey of the China Mainland Press changed its name to Survey of the People's Republic of China Press and was thereafter known as SPRCP.

This is a revised version of a table which appears in Kenneth Lieberthal's Research Guide to Central Party and Government Meetings in China, 1949-1975 (White Plains, N.Y.: International Arts and Sciences Press, Inc., 1976), p. xviii.

During the years when the greatest number of editorials were written, two and sometimes three editorials appeared in the People's Daily each day. Thus, one might occasionally find the same date repeated under one subject heading. Or, after consulting the subject index and referring to the list of titles, one might encounter several titles for the same date. The titles themselves will generally reveal enough about the content of the editorial to locate the correct one.

Finally, a technical note. The microfilm of the early years of the People's Daily is not complete, and twenty-five editorials could not be located at the University of Michigan. The following editorials, then, were included in the list of editorial titles but could not be indexed.

Using the Research Guide

We have elaborated upon the significance of the People's Daily editorial in the Chinese political process and have suggested a number of ways in which the Research Guide could be applied to the study of modern China. The two sections of the Research Guide can function separately or as a unit. Readers interested in a particular time period will find the chronological list of editorial titles a useful summary of information. Those investigating one or several topics will turn to the second section.

In all cases, however, extensive use of the Research Guide should not be made without referring to the editorials themselves. Editorial titles can only suggest the content and, in fact, often tell little about the range of issues covered. In addition, the nature and composition of the editorial itself changed radically over the years from 1949 to 1975. These changes must be read to be appreciated.

It is probably most important to actually read the editorials when one is using the subject index. Particularly for those not well acquainted with the field, the interpretation of many of the index topics can be confusing. Even for those long involved in the study of China, accurate assessment of index subjects requires delving into the editorials themselves. Finally, the significance of major and minor themes varied with different index topics and can only be evaluated in context.

Subject Index to the People's Daily Editorials

Using the Subject Index

1. Under each subject heading is a column of dates. These are the editorial publication dates and correspond to the dates by which the editorial titles are listed in the first section of the Research Guide.
2. Preceding the subject index is the entire outline of index topics. The entire organization of the index is presented in this way in order to acquaint the reader with the wide range of topics in the index and to provide a more thorough definition of the abbreviated headings found in the index itself. Often many of the topics will be relevant to a research topic, and the reader should review the entire list of topics at the outset.
3. In the index, an asterisk (*) after an editorial date indicates that the subject was a major theme in the editorial. Each editorial was indexed exhaustively. That is, each editorial was indexed for both its major and minor themes. An editorial generally contained about five or six themes. However, some touched on as many as fifteen, while others only covered one or two. To cope with this large number, the themes were divided into two types: if more than one paragraph in an editorial was devoted to a subject, it was classified as a major theme; if a subject was contained in one paragraph or less, it was a minor theme. Briefly mentioned items were not indexed. The number of major themes in each editorial averaged two or three; depending upon the length and depth of the editorial, however, it could range from one to five.
4. During the years when the greatest number of editorials were written, two and sometimes three editorials appeared in the People's Daily each day. The titles themselves will generally reveal enough about the content of the editorial for the reader to locate the desired one.
5. Finally, because the microfilm of the early years of the People's Daily is incomplete, twenty-five editorials are missing. A list of those missing editorials can be found in the Preface to the Research Guide (see p. xvi).
